

Revising Techniques

- I rewrite the notes given in class in my own words and then I use that to refer back to when answering past paper questions.
- I use mind maps and learn from them and keep re-writing them, so I remember. Then I get tested on it. I sometimes also use flash cards and past paper questions.
- I read over all of my notes and then write down how I would if I was answering an exam question with notes to refer from at first. As I learn it more than I use my notes less until I don't need them anymore. However once I have reached this stage I still read my notes and practice writing answers.
- Flash cards as it kept in small facts.
- Past papers/ extra help from teacher – extra classes after school/ online material.
- After going over something write small parts of what I went over on flash cards.
- I read over what we have covered in class that day and then keep testing myself again and again each week to make sure I remember. I also look over a subject a night for 60-90 minutes.
- I'll read it over then I'll cover it and then rewrite it and I'll do this at least 6/7 times over and over until I get it right. If I can't then I'll go onto something else and then go back to that. I also find reading it in my head then out aloud and writing it out works as well.
- I create summarised posters then test myself with questions that relate to the units. Eventually doing as many past papers as possible to see which questions I need to go over or improve.
- I make mind-maps with main topics in the centre, and all the relevant information relating to that subject around it. I also do past papers and flashcards to test myself on the knowledge. My friends and I also test each other and then mark our answers.
- I revise by re-writing all of my notes, I look over my notes then cover them and re-write them to try and help me remember them. I also make mind-maps, this helps me visualise the different topics and how they link.
- I record myself reading quotations, important sections from my jotters/work books and summary notes. I then listen to them either with my eyes shut or as I read through what I'm listening to.
- I read/write/listen to a piece of knowledge I need to remember a few times over then write/say it to myself.
- With things like essays I will sometimes write the essay a couple times until I believe I've got as close to perfect as possible.
- Revision notes in my own words whilst learning throughout year. Past papers and questions. Mind maps around prelim time. Recreate mind-maps at exam time. Recreate mind-maps at exam time. Flashcards. Past papers before exams.
- My best revision technique would probably be taking notes and re-writing them on posters. I would then usually re-read them to a point where I began to remember information before using a past paper or bitesize to identify the areas I was still struggling on.
- I read information then cover it up to test if I can remember the information I find it helps me remember things later on during tests easier.
- I write on cards and recite them for myself.
